NO. 13

What and how China can contribute to international development? — Launching the IDS Special Issue on China and International Development

Background and Objective

China's recent rise is both a cause and a symptom of the fundamental change now affecting development assistance and policy. In focusing on China and international development, this public event will address China's shifting roles in a fast-shifting development era.

By bringing together analysts and practitioners, we hope this special event will stimulate and further open up debate both in China and across the world around how we can learn together to shape futures that affect us all

Q&A (30 minutes)

About CIDRN's Public Event Series

The global political and economic order has been substantially changed over the last decade. The development experiences from emerging powers have attracted great attention from both the developed and the developing world in coping with traditional and new challenges.

It aims at sharing knowledge on international development with outstanding individuals and institutions, both within China and abroad, to develop a knowledge pool on international development in China, to facilitate the exchange between China and the international development community.

Organized by:

China International Development Research Network (CIDRN)
With the support of College of Humanities and Development Studies (COHD) /Research Center for International Development (RCID)
